The Fractured Mirror: Radicalism, Resonance, and the Reconstruction of British-Irish Cohesion

Executive Summary

The British Isles, encompassing the complex geopolitical entities of the United Kingdom and Ireland, currently stands at a precarious ideological juncture. The post-Brexit landscape, exacerbated by a punishing cost-of-living crisis and global geopolitical instability, has created fertile ground for the resurgence of radical political movements. These movements, while ostensibly operating under divergent ideological banners—Irish dissident republicanism, international revolutionary communism, and secular anti-monarchism—demonstrate a remarkable convergence in their manipulative tactics. This report offers an exhaustive analysis of three emblematic campaigns: the Éirígí "United Ireland" movement, the Revolutionary Communists of Ireland's "Are you a communist?" recruitment drive, and the Republic "Not My King" campaign.

Our research identifies a shared operational "genome" among these groups: the weaponization of economic alienation, the construction of binary "us-vs-them" identity narratives, and the strategic exploitation of historical grievance. However, the report posits that the antidote to this manufactured division lies not in political counter-polarization, but in the elevation of the deep, shared cultural heritage that binds the populations of these islands. By examining the linguistic intertwining of the Goidelic and Brythonic traditions, the unifying power of shared media experiences like "Derry Girls", and the stabilizing rituals of daily life—from the Sunday Roast to shared consumer habits involving Ribena, Lucozade, and Cadbury—we delineate a strategy for fostering a "East-West" cultural consciousness. This "Cultural Archipelago" framework offers a resilient substrate for unity that transcends the fragility of contemporary political discourse.

---

1. Introduction: The Geopolitics of Alienation in the British Isles

The geopolitical relationship between Britain and Ireland has always been characterized by a duality of intimacy and estrangement. In the third decade of the 21st century, this relationship is being tested by a "poly-crisis"—a confluence of economic stagnation, constitutional uncertainty following the UK's departure from the European Union, and a broader global crisis of confidence in liberal democracy. It is within this chaotic interregnum that radical fringe movements have found renewed purchase, stepping into the vacuum left by the perceived failures of mainstream governance.

1.1 The Context of Crisis

The backdrop to the campaigns analyzed in this report is one of profound social anxiety. The "cost of living crisis" is not merely an economic statistic; it is a psychological stressor that erodes trust in established institutions.[1] In both the UK and Ireland, skyrocketing housing costs, inflation in essential goods, and the stagnation of real wages have created a demographic of the "locked out"—younger generations who feel that the social contract has been broken.[2]

This economic precarity is the fuel for radicalization. When the "American Dream" (or its British/Irish equivalent of home ownership and stable employment) becomes unattainable, the revolutionary alternative becomes rational. As noted in research on youth radicalization, the "psychology of these people is like that of soldiers waiting to be mobilized for class war".[4] The radical campaigns discussed here do not create this anger; they curate it. They provide a target—be it the British Crown, the capitalist class, or the partition of Ireland—for a free-floating rage that originates in economic dispossession.

1.2 The Three Vectors of Dissent

This report focuses on three specific vectors of this dissent, each representing a different facet of the radical challenge:

1. Éirígí ("Rise Up"): Representing the dissident Irish republican tradition, Éirígí critiques the Good Friday Agreement settlement from the left, arguing that the peace process has cemented British occupation and failed to deliver a socialist republic.[5]
2. The Revolutionary Communists of Ireland (RCI): Formerly the Irish section of the International Marxist Tendency (IMT), this group has launched a highly visible, visually aggressive "Are you a communist?" campaign targeting youth with promises of revolutionary overthrow.[4]
3. Republic: Operating within the UK, this pressure group utilized the transition of the monarchy to launch the "Not My King" campaign, challenging the legitimacy of the head of state through the lens of democratic secularism and economic inequality.[8]

While distinct in their goals, these campaigns are united by their methodology: they are all disruptive, performative, and binary. They seek to force the observer to choose a side, eliminating the middle ground of compromise and nuance that has characterized British-Irish relations since the late 1990s.

---

2. The Ecology of Radicalism: A Deep Dive into Campaign Tactics

To dismantle the narratives of division, one must first understand their architecture. Each of the three campaigns utilizes a sophisticated blend of historical revisionism, psychological targeting, and public spectacle to advance their aims.

2.1 Éirígí and the "United Ireland" Campaign: The Weaponization of the Unfinished Revolution

Éirígí, founded in 2006 by activists who split from Sinn Féin, positions itself as the custodian of the "true" 1916 Proclamation. Their "United Ireland" campaign is not merely constitutional but explicitly socialist, viewing the reunification of Ireland as inseparable from the overthrow of capitalism.

2.1.1 Ideological Differentiation and the "Sell-Out" Narrative

The central tactic of Éirígí is differentiation. They define themselves in opposition not just to the British state, but to "mainstream" republicanism (Sinn Féin), which they portray as having been co-opted by the establishment. The research highlights their focus on the "extent and limits of ideological and policy changes within Sinn Féin" which created the space for dissident emergence.[5]

A key rhetorical device used by Éirígí is the weaponization of failed promises. For example, during the 25th anniversary of the Good Friday Agreement, Éirígí published materials reminding supporters of Sinn Féin's past claims that a United Ireland would be achieved by 2016.[6] By highlighting this "failure," they sow cynicism regarding the diplomatic/political route to unity, implicitly suggesting that more radical, grassroots agitation is the only viable path. This utilizes a psychological tactic known as expectancy violation, turning the disappointment of the base into radical energy.

2.1.2 The Politics of Public Space and Commemoration

Éirígí's tactical deployment relies heavily on the occupation of symbolic space. Their manifesto and public actions prioritize "public ownership" campaigns—such as the "Lough Neagh Must Be Brought Into Public Ownership" initiative—which link the concept of British partition to environmental degradation and corporate greed.[10]

Furthermore, their use of posters is distinctively aggressive. Slogans like "End Unemployment – Nationalise the Banks" and "Join Sinn Féin for a United Socialist Ireland" (used ironically or historically to highlight modern deviations) clutter the visual landscape of working-class areas.[11] These materials often feature the Starry Plough, a symbol of the Irish Citizen Army, thereby visually claiming the lineage of James Connolly and the socialist element of the 1916 Rising. By dominating the visual sphere in specific neighborhoods, they create a localized hegemony, making their radical position appear as the "common sense" view of the community.

2.2 The RCI's "Are you a communist?": Manufacturing a Revolutionary Vanguard

The transition of the International Marxist Tendency (IMT) to the Revolutionary Communist International (RCI), and its Irish affiliate's adoption of the "Are you a communist?" slogan, represents a paradigmatic shift in radical leftist recruitment. This campaign moves away from complex theoretical debates and embraces a visceral, identity-based appeal.

2.2.1 The Psychology of the Binary Question

The slogan "Are you a communist?" is a masterpiece of psychological filtering. It is a binary qualifier that admits no nuance. As noted in internal strategy documents revealed in the research, the campaign is designed to find those whose psychology is "like that of soldiers waiting to be mobilized for class war".[4]

- Identity Fusion: The question invites the target to fuse their personal identity with a political category. It targets young people who feel alienated by the current system, offering them not just a policy set, but a being. To "be" a communist in this framework is to be part of a historical vanguard.
- The "Soldier" Mentality: The rhetoric used is explicitly martial. New recruits are described as "fighters" and "cadres".[13] This appeals particularly to young men seeking purpose and structure in an atomized, gig-economy society. It replaces the chaos of modern life with the rigid, comforting hierarchy of the "Party."

2.2.2 The "Stickering" Blitz and the Illusion of Majority

The physical execution of the campaign relies on the "stickering" of public spaces. Over 100,000 posters and stickers were deployed across the UK and Ireland in a single year.[15] This tactic creates an availability cascade; a student walking to university sees the sticker on a lamppost, then on a bus stop, then in a bathroom stall. This ubiquity creates the illusion that the movement is massive, growing, and inevitable, triggering a "bandwagon effect" where individuals join simply to be on the winning side of history.[16]

2.2.3 Leveraging Catastrophe

The RCI's narrative framework is one of terminal crisis. They describe the world as "sleeping on a volcano" and frame every news event—from the war in Ukraine to climate change—as proof of capitalism's final collapse.[13] This catastrophism induces a state of urgency. If the world is ending, moderate reform is futile; only revolutionary overthrow is logical. This effectively bypasses critical thinking about the feasibility of their program, as the alternative is presented as extinction.

2.3 Republic's "Not My King": The Performance of Secular Dissent

While less ideologically extreme than Éirígí or the RCI, the "Not My King" campaign by the pressure group Republic employs similar tactical mechanisms to delegitimize the British monarchy.

2.3.1 Disruption of Ritual

The monarchy relies on the uninterrupted performance of ritual to maintain its mystique and authority. Republic's strategy is ritual disruption. During the coronation of King Charles III, activists utilized bright yellow placards—visually dissonant against the Union Jacks and royal regalia—to break the "spell" of the ceremony.[8] The chanting of "Not My King" serves to puncture the assumption of national consensus.

The arrest of Republic's CEO, Graham Smith, and other activists during the coronation was a pivotal moment.[8] While the police later apologized, the campaign leveraged these arrests to frame the monarchy as a threat to civil liberties, arguing that the institution requires authoritarian policing to survive. This tactic creates a victimhood narrative that appeals to liberals concerned with free speech, broadening the campaign's appeal beyond staunch republicans.

2.3.2 The Economic Wedge

Like Éirígí and the RCI, Republic weaponizes economic grievance. The chant "what a waste of money" during royal processions is designed to link the cost of royal pageantry directly to the viewer's personal financial struggles.[9] By highlighting the personal wealth of the King (£2 billion) and his exemption from inheritance tax [9], the campaign transforms a constitutional argument into a visceral class conflict. This utilizes inequality aversion, a deep-seated psychological bias, to generate resentment against a target that is framed as parasitic.

---

3. Comparative Anatomy of Manipulation: The Matrix of Division

When we overlay the tactical blueprints of these three campaigns, a clear pattern emerges. Despite their differing end goals, they share a common "operating system" for generating division.

Table 1: Comparative Analysis of Manipulative Tactics

| Tactical Mechanism | Éirígí ("United Ireland") | RCI ("Are you a communist?") | Republic ("Not My King") | Psychological Root |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Binary Framing | Occupier vs. Occupied | Proletariat vs. Bourgeoisie | Citizen vs. Subject | Us-vs-Them Thinking: Reduces complex social reality to a Manichean struggle, forcing identity alignment.[18] |
| Crisis Leveraging | Housing/Water crisis = Partition | Climate/War = Capitalism | Cost of Living = Royal Greed | Disaster Populism: Exploits external crises to validate internal ideology, |

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | | | offering the ideology as the only "cure".[1] |
| Historical Revisionism | Gatekeeping the "True" 1916 | Idealizing 1917 Bolshevism | Framing Monarchy as "Feudal" | Temporal Displacement: Framing the opponent as "the past" and the movement as "the future".[5] |
| Visual Disruption | Paramilitary-style color parties | Ubiquitous red stickers | Yellow placards, booing | Illusion of Majority: Creating visibility disproportionate to support to legitimize the fringe.[16] |
| Targeting Alienation | Disaffected working class | Alienated youth/students | Anti-establishment liberals | Identity Fusion: Offering a sense of belonging and agency to the disenfranchised.[12] |

3.1 The "Us vs. Them" Trap

The fundamental output of all these campaigns is affective polarization. They do not merely argue that the "other" (the British government, the capitalist, the monarch) is mistaken; they argue that the "other" is an existential threat to the well-being of the "people." This "othering" process dehumanizes the opponent and justifies radical action. In the context of the British Isles, where populations are deeply intertwined through marriage, migration, and culture, this fabricated polarization is particularly corrosive. It seeks to sever the organic bonds of the East-West relationship by imposing rigid North-South or Class binaries.

---

4. The Substrate of Unity: Overcoming Division Through Shared Culture

To counteract the centrifugal forces of radicalism, we must identify and strengthen the centripetal forces of shared culture. The "us-vs-them" narrative crumbles when confronted with the reality of the British-Irish experience, which is one of deep, historic, and ongoing fusion. The following sections explore the specific cultural pillars that can support a narrative of unity.

4.1 The Linguistic Bond: The Insular Celtic Family

Radical nationalism often uses language as a wall—a marker of distinct and separate nationhood. However, a deeper linguistic analysis reveals that the languages of the British Isles are branches of the same tree. The Insular Celtic hypothesis provides a powerful framework for understanding this unity.

4.1.1 Goidelic and Brythonic: Cousins, Not Strangers

Academic consensus, supported by research into the "Insular Celtic" model, suggests that the Goidelic languages (Irish, Scottish Gaelic, Manx) and the Brythonic languages (Welsh, Cornish, Breton) evolved together in these islands, distinct from the Continental Celtic languages of Europe.[22]

- Deep Grammar: Both branches share unique linguistic innovations not found elsewhere in the Indo-European family, such as inflected prepositions (e.g., Irish agam, Welsh gennyf for "at me/with me") and the VSO (Verb-Subject-Object) word order.[23] These are not superficial borrowings but deep structural similarities that indicate a shared way of conceptualizing the world.
- Cognate Vocabulary: The divergence between "P-Celtic" (Brythonic) and "Q-Celtic" (Goidelic) is often overstated. Fundamental vocabulary remains cognate. The word for "four" is ceathair in Irish and pedwar in Welsh; "five" is cúig and pump.[25] These echoes act as linguistic DNA, proving a common ancestry.

4.1.2 Modern Pan-Celticism as a Bridge

Initiatives like the Colmcille partnership (between Foras na Gaeilge in Ireland and Bòrd na Gàidhlig in Scotland) actively bridge the gap between speakers, fostering a "Gaelic archipelago" that ignores the political border in the Irish Sea.[26] Similarly, the Pan-Celtic Festival, held in towns like Carlow, brings together speakers from all six Celtic nations.[28] Highlighting these connections undermines the "British vs. Irish" cultural dichotomy by revealing a shared indigenous heritage that predates the concepts of "United Kingdom" or "Republic of Ireland."

4.2 The Mythological Archipelago

The shared culture of the British Isles is rooted in a mythological landscape that is permeable and interconnected.

- The Arthurian Bridge: While often claimed as a "British" (and later English) figure, King Arthur is a Brythonic hero whose legends are deeply entwined with the Welsh Mabinogion and share motifs with Irish cycles.[30] Characters like Tristan and Iseult represent a pan-Insular romance, bridging Cornwall, Ireland, and Brittany.
- Finn McCool and the Giants: The legend of Fionn mac Cumhaill (Finn McCool) building the Giant's Causeway to fight a Scottish giant physically and mythologically links Ulster to Scotland.[31] Geological reality mirrors mythological truth: the basalt columns on both sides of the North Channel are the same formation. This serves as a powerful metaphor for the region: politically divided, but geologically and mythologically one.

4.3 The Mediated Mirror: "Derry Girls" and the Comedy of Recognition

In the modern era, television and media have become the primary vehicles for cultural exchange. The sitcom "Derry Girls" stands as a supreme example of how culture can heal political rifts through the "comedy of recognition."

4.3.1 De-weaponizing the Troubles

"Derry Girls" succeeds because it universalizes the specific. Set during the Troubles, it refuses to let the conflict define the humanity of its characters. Research indicates that the show resonates across the UK because it focuses on "universal experiences like school, friendships, family, and identity".[21]

- The Blackboard Scene: The show's most potent satire of sectarianism occurs when the characters attempt to list differences between Catholics and Protestants on a blackboard, only to fail spectacularly (noting only that Protestants "keep toasters in cupboards").[32] This scene exposes the narcissism of small differences, effectively laughing the "us-vs-them" binary out of the room.
- Cross-Border Viewership: The show is a cultural phenomenon in Great Britain as much as in Ireland.[33] It has done more to humanize the population of Northern Ireland to the British public than decades of political speeches, creating a reservoir of empathy that acts as a buffer against radical "othering."

4.3.2 The Soap Opera Bond

This cultural flow is bidirectional. British soap operas like "Coronation Street" and "EastEnders" have historically maintained massive viewership in Ireland.[34] These shows create a shared "watercooler" culture. An Irish person and an English person can instantly bond over a reference to "Ken Barlow" or the "Queen Vic." This shared pop-cultural vocabulary creates a para-social intimacy between the nations, making it difficult for radical nationalists to portray the "Brit" as a totally alien "other."

4.4 The Rituals of the Table: Habitual Culture and "Nostalgia Brands"

Perhaps the most resilient layer of shared culture is found in the banal, daily rituals of consumption. Radical ideologies struggle to penetrate the comfort of shared habits.

4.4.1 The Sunday Roast: A Secular Sacrament

The Sunday Roast is a ritual common to the entire archipelago. Originating in the 15th century with the Yeomen of the Guard, it evolved into a domestic institution linked to the timing of church services.[35] Whether in Cork, Belfast, Cardiff, or Leeds, the sensory experience is identical: roasted meat, potatoes, gravy, and vegetables.

- Sociological Function: In a time of "cost of living" anxiety—precisely the anxiety exploited by Republic and RCI—the Sunday Roast represents stability, family continuity, and comfort.[36] It is a "secular sacrament" that reaffirms the social bond of the family unit, which is the primary defense against the atomization that leads to radicalization.

4.4.2 The Brandscapes of Home

Certain consumer brands act as cultural shibboleths for the British and Irish, distinguishing them from the rest of Europe or America.

- Ribena & Lucozade: These beverages are deeply embedded in the childhood memories of the region.[37] Lucozade, originally a "hospital drink" for convalescence, and Ribena, a source of Vitamin C during WWII, are shared markers of care and recovery.
- Cadbury: The "glass and a half" symbolism of Cadbury chocolate is a unifying taste preference that defies borders.[39] The fierce loyalty to these specific flavor profiles (distinct from American or continental chocolate) creates a subtle "taste community."
- The Crisp Sandwich: The phenomenon of the crisp sandwich (whether Tayto or Walkers) is a uniquely British/Irish culinary eccentricity.[40] It is a shared "in-joke" of the archipelago, a habit that baffles outsiders but unites the locals in a bond of shared peculiarity.

Table 2: The Cultural Archipelago – Shared Markers of Unity

| Cultural Marker | Origin/Context | Function in Countering Radicalism |
|---|---|---|
| Language | Cúig (Ir) / Pump (Welsh) | Cognate Evidence: Proves deep ancestral kinship, countering the narrative of separate "races".[25] |
| Media | Derry Girls / Father Ted | Humanization: Uses humor to dismantle sectarian stereotypes and build cross-border empathy.[21] |
| Ritual | Sunday Roast | Stability: A shared weekly ritual that reinforces family bonds against social atomization.[42] |
| Myth | Giant's Causeway | Geological Connection: Physical proof of the link between Ulster and Scotland.[31] |
| Brands | Ribena / Cadbury | Nostalgic Bonding: Shared childhood sensory experiences that create non-political common ground.[37] |

5. Strategic Remediation: Operationalizing the Cultural Archipelago

To defeat the narratives of division offered by Éirígí, the RCI, and Republic, we must move from passive observation of these shared cultures to active cultural diplomacy. We must build a strategy that emphasizes the East-West axis (Britain-Ireland) as strongly as the North-South one.

5.1 Strengthening Institutional Frameworks

Existing political frameworks like the British-Irish Council must be leveraged to support cultural initiatives. The "East-West Council" proposed in recent government command papers [43] offers a vehicle for this.

- Educational Exchange: Programs like "Intertrade UK" and commitments to school twinning between Northern Ireland and Great Britain [43] should be expanded to include the Republic of Ireland. A "Colmcille" for schools—linking students in Liverpool, Dublin, and Glasgow—would foster organic relationships early in life.
- Youth Mobility: The "Youth Exchange programme" boosting East/West relations, such as those run by the Rio Ferdinand Foundation [44], serves as a model. These programs remove young people from the "echo chambers" of their local communities (where Éirígí or RCI stickers might be dominant) and expose them to the reality of their neighbors.

5.2 Cultural Diplomacy 2.0

Agencies like Culture Ireland and the British Council must collaborate more explicitly on "East-West" projects.[45]

- Shared Touring Circuits: Facilitating the movement of theater, art, and music between the islands. The "Cultural Bridge" initiative (currently focused on Germany) should be adapted for a dedicated UK-Ireland strand.[47]
- The "Shared Isles" Narrative: Government communications should subtly adopt the language of the "Shared Isles" or "Cultural Archipelago," emphasizing that one can be proudly Irish or proudly British while acknowledging a shared civilization.

5.3 Addressing the Economic Root

Finally, culture alone cannot solve economic despair. The radicalism of the RCI and Éirígí thrives on genuine hardship. Addressing the cost of living crisis is a security imperative. However, cultural resilience helps distinct communities weather these storms together. By promoting the narrative that "we are in this together" (a sentiment often evoked during WWII or the pandemic), the state can prevent economic grievance from mutating into sectarian or revolutionary rage.

---

6. Conclusion: The Resilience of the Archipelago

The campaigns of Éirígí, the Revolutionary Communists of Ireland, and Republic are formidable because they are built on a keen understanding of modern alienation. They offer simple, binary answers to complex, painful questions. They tell the angry youth, the struggling renter, and the disillusioned voter that their problems have a single enemy: the British connection, capitalism, or the King.

However, their weakness lies in their reliance on division. The peoples of the British Isles are woven together by threads far stronger than political constitutions: the shared rhythms of a Sunday lunch, the linguistic echoes of the Celtic past, the shared laughter at a sitcom character, and the shared mythology of their landscape. This is the Cultural Archipelago.

The path forward is not to fight these radical movements on their own terms—creating more polarization—but to undercut them by revealing the deep, undeniable reality of our shared life. By celebrating the connections between Goidelic and Brythonic, between Derry and London, between the tea drinker in Dublin and the tea drinker in Manchester, we build a "common ground" [47] that no slogan can dismantle. The unity of these islands is not a political project to be achieved; it is a cultural reality to be recognized.

Works cited

1. The response of low-income households to the cost-of-living crisis in Ireland - The Economic and Social Research Institute, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.esri.ie/pubs/RS206.pdf
2. The impact of the cost of living crisis on young people - Youth Select Committee 2024, accessed February 6, 2026, https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm5804/cmselect/cmyouth/cost-living-crisis-young-people/report.html
3. Far-right discourses, right-wing populism and the question of housing in Ireland, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.ui.se/globalassets/ui.se-eng/publications/ui-publications/2025/ui-report-no.-5-2025.pdf
4. It is time to launch a Revolutionary Communist International! - Marxist.com, accessed February 6, 2026, https://marxist.com/it-is-time-to-launch-a-revolutionary-communist-international.htm
5. Spoiling the peace?: The threat of dissident Republicans to peace in Northern Ireland - Manchester Hive, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.manchesterhive.com/downloadpdf/9780719098697/9780719098697.pdf
6. GFA 25 - Remember When Sinn Féin Claimed There Would Be A United Ireland By 2016?, accessed February 6, 2026, https://eirigi.org/latestnews/2023/4/11/gfa-25-remember-when-sinn-fin-claimed-there-would-be-a-united-irelandnbspbynbsp2016
7. Forged amid Global Turmoil: The First World Congress of the Revolutionary

Communist International, accessed February 6, 2026, https://communistusa.org/forged-amid-global-turmoil-the-first-world-congress-of-the-revolutionary-communist-international/
8. Republicanism in the United Kingdom - Wikipedia, accessed February 6, 2026, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Republicanism_in_the_United_Kingdom
9. Anti-monarchists chant 'what a waste of money' as King opens Parliament, accessed February 6, 2026, https://jerseyeveningpost.com/morenews/uknews/2023/11/07/anti-monarchists-chant-what-a-waste-of-money-as-king-opens-parliament/
10. On The Shoulders Of Giants . . . 'Bodenstown Speech 1966' - Seamus Costello — Éirígí For A New Republic, accessed February 6, 2026, https://eirigi.org/latestnews/2024/6/21/on-the-shoulders-of-giants-seamus-costellos-1966-bodenstown-speech
11. political poster | Irish Election Literature, accessed February 6, 2026, https://irishelectionliterature.com/tag/political-poster/
12. It Is Time to Launch a Revolutionary Communist International!, accessed February 6, 2026, https://communistusa.org/it-is-time-to-launch-a-revolutionary-communist-international/
13. Forged amid global turmoil: the first World Congress of the Revolutionary Communist International, accessed February 6, 2026, https://communist.red/forged-amid-global-turmoil-the-first-world-congress-of-the-revolutionary-communist-international/
14. Second congress of the Revolutionary Communists of Ireland: we have a world to win!, accessed February 6, 2026, https://marxist.com/second-congress-of-the-revolutionary-communists-of-ireland.htm
15. Socialist Appeal wrapped 2023 | The Communist, accessed February 6, 2026, https://communist.red/socialist-appeal-wrapped-2023/
16. Are you a communist? - Marxist.com, accessed February 6, 2026, https://marxist.com/are-you-a-communist.htm?start=90
17. What is anti-monarchy group Republic and what other royal events has it protested at?, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2023/may/06/who-are-anti-monarchy-group-republic-and-what-other-royal-events-have-they-protested-at
18. A troubling cost—A study of the republican sacrifice in murals - Frontiers, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.frontiersin.org/journals/sociology/articles/10.3389/fsoc.2024.1490546/full
19. Theory | The Communist, accessed February 6, 2026, https://communist.red/category/theory/page/21/
20. micro-moral worlds of contentious politics - Mobilization: An International Quarterly, accessed February 6, 2026, https://mobilization.kglmeridian.com/downloadpdf/view/journals/maiq/23/2/article-p219.pdf

21. Youth and Truth in Northern Ireland: What Modern 'Derry Girls' Can Teach Us | School of Psychology | Queen's University Belfast, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.qub.ac.uk/schools/psy/News/YouthandTruthinNorthernIrelandWhatModernDerryGirlsCanTeachUs.html
22. Toward a phylogenetic chronology of ancient Gaulish, Celtic, and Indo-European - PNAS, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.pnas.org/doi/10.1073/pnas.1331158100
23. Insular Celtic languages - Wikipedia, accessed February 6, 2026, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Insular_Celtic_languages
24. What is the origin of the Goidelic language? - Quora, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.quora.com/What-is-the-origin-of-the-Goidelic-language
25. Are Celtic and Irish the same language? - Quora, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.quora.com/Are-Celtic-and-Irish-the-same-language
26. Foras na Gaeilge Colmcille Strategy 2019 - 2021, accessed February 6, 2026, https://colmcille.net/wp-content/uploads/2020/05/Colmcille-Strategy-2019-2021-Final-Version-11.12.2018-2.pdf
27. Columba Project - Wikipedia, accessed February 6, 2026, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Columba_Project
28. Pan Celtic Festival - Wikipedia, accessed February 6, 2026, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pan_Celtic_Festival
29. Preparing for the Celts – Carlow a home of International Celebration of Celtic Culture., accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.localenterprise.ie/carlow/news/preparing-for-the-celts-%E2%80%93-carlow-a-home-of-international-celebration-of-celtic-culture-.html
30. Tristan and Iseult - Wikipedia, accessed February 6, 2026, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Tristan_and_Iseult
31. How simaller is Scottish compared to Irish and Welsh mythologies? - Reddit, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.reddit.com/r/mythology/comments/1hmcolc/how_simaller_is_scottish_compared_to_irish_and/
32. Modern “Derry Girls”: How teens navigate polarisation in a post-conflict society - LSE Blogs, accessed February 6, 2026, https://blogs.lse.ac.uk/religionglobalsociety/2024/02/modern-derry-girls-how-teens-navigate-polarisation-in-a-post-conflict-society/
33. Is Derry Girls funnier if you're British/Irish? : r/DerryGirls - Reddit, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.reddit.com/r/DerryGirls/comments/bg3j48/is_derry_girls_funnier_if_youre_britishirish/
34. Coronation Street and EastEnders suffers huge drop in ratings as Netflix lures fans in, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.irishmirror.ie/tv/coronation-street-eastenders-suffers-huge-23804373
35. The History of the Great British Sunday Roast - The Spruce Eats, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.thespruceeats.com/history-of-the-british-sunday-roast-4149600

36. The Guardian view on the Sunday roast: a tradition worth preserving | Editorial, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.theguardian.com/commentisfree/2016/mar/05/the-guardian-view-on-the-sunday-roast-a-tradition-worth-preserving
37. Has your taste in food/drinks changed over the years, or are they just making stuff worse than they used to? : r/CasualUK - Reddit, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.reddit.com/r/CasualUK/comments/1qd1v17/has_your_taste_in_fooddrinks_changed_over_the/
38. Whats one product that has changed, that you wosh the old version would come back? : r/CasualUK - Reddit, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.reddit.com/r/CasualUK/comments/1lb58xb/whats_one_product_that_has_changed_that_you_wosh/
39. Retail Express - 1 November 2022 by BetterRetailing - Issuu, accessed February 6, 2026, https://issuu.com/newtradepublishing/docs/retail_express_1_november_2022
40. UK culture: lifestyle, higher education, food and traditions, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.kingstonisc.com/blog/uk-culture
41. Celebrating Father Ted | Den of Geek, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.denofgeek.com/tv/celebrating-father-ted/
42. English Culture and Traditions - An Essential Guide - Wilderness England, accessed February 6, 2026, https://wildernessengland.com/english-culture/
43. UK Government Ministers to meet with Northern Ireland schools ahead of East-West Council, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.gov.uk/government/news/uk-government-ministers-to-meet-with-northern-ireland-schools-ahead-of-east-west-council
44. Youth Exchange programme boosts East/West relations - Rio Ferdinand Foundation, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.rioferdinandfoundation.com/news/youth-exchange-programme-boosts-eastwest-relations
45. Our work with EUNIC - British Council | Ireland, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.britishcouncil.ie/programmes/arts/eunic
46. British Council and Arts Council of Northern Ireland mark 12 years of international collaboration with new MOU signing, accessed February 6, 2026, https://nireland.britishcouncil.org/about/press/british-council-and-arts-council-northern-ireland-mark-12-years-international
47. Cultural Bridge Round 2, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.cultural-bridge.info/media/cultural_bridge_year_two_evaluation_report_tialt.pdf