The Crown of the Corrib and the Imperium of the Irish Sea: A Dynastic, Jurisprudential, and Geopolitical Warrant for the High Kingship of Ireland

1. Introduction: The Geopolitical and Genealogical Matrix

The assertion of a claim to the High Kingship of Ireland (Ard Rí na hÉireann) in the twenty-first century represents a profound intervention into the constitutional and cultural fabric of the British Isles. It is a performative reconstruction of identity that transcends antiquarian revivalism, positing a "Neo-Jacobite" political theology capable of reconciling the historic fissures between Gaelic sovereignty and the British Crown. This research report, commissioned to evaluate the dynastic assertions of Cian Mac Liatháin Uí Dhéisigh (Cian Lyons Deacy), provides an exhaustive analysis of the "Dual Blood" lineage (Uí Liatháin/Uí Dhéisigh) and its capacity to interface with the legal sovereignty of the House of Windsor.
The core hypothesis of this report is that the claimant embodies the "Irish Sea Imperium"—an ancient, trans-marine sphere of influence established by his ancestors, the Uí Liatháin, who colonized Wales and Cornwall in late antiquity. By fusing this ancient maritime authority with the martial territoriality of the Uí Dhéisigh (Déisi) and the modern legal reality of the British Monarchy (specifically King Charles III as King of Northern Ireland), the claimant constructs a "Combined Force" strategy. This strategy seeks to claim the historic Kingdom of Aileach as a cross-border seat of power and utilize this platform to empower Pan-Celtic Gaeltacht areas across Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and Cornwall.
This analysis proceeds through a rigorous deconstruction of genealogy, heraldry, and topography. It examines the transition of British Royal titles from King Charles III to Prince William (Prince of Wales), analyzing their increasing engagement with indigenous languages (Cymraeg and Kernewek) as a precedent for the claimant's own "Cultural Monarchy."
Ultimately, this document argues that the "Dual Monarchy" framework—rooted in the Crown of Ireland Act 1542 and the policy of "Surrender and Regrant"—offers a viable theoretical model for a modern, federalist High Kingship that harmonizes the "Crown of Tara" with the "Crown of St. Edward."

2. The Uí Liatháin Diaspora: Architects of the Irish Sea

Imperium

To understand the claimant's assertion of a "British-Irish" dual authority, one must first excavate the history of the Uí Liatháin, the primary paternal lineage of the claim. Unlike the insular dynasties of the Irish midlands, the Uí Liatháin were the architects of an early "Irish Sea Imperium," a maritime empire that spanned the Hibernian and Brythonic worlds.

2.1 The Maritime Projection of Munster

The Uí Liatháin originated in the early medieval Kingdom of Munster, specifically in the fertile lands of East Cork (Caisleán Uí Liatháin / Castlelyons) and West Waterford.[1] Descended from Eochu Liathán ("Eochu the Grey"), son of Dáire Cerbba, they belonged to the proto-Eóganachta or Érainn population.[2] While the Eóganachta Chaisil consolidated power inland at Cashel, the Uí Liatháin looked outward to the sea.

Historical records, including the Sanas Cormaic (Cormac's Glossary) and the Historia Brittonum, confirm that during the 4th and 5th centuries AD—coinciding with the withdrawal of Roman legions from Britain—the Uí Liatháin launched a sustained campaign of colonization across the Irish Sea.[3] This was not merely raiding; it was a dynastic transplantation, establishing settlements that would fundamentally alter the demography and politics of western Britain.

2.2 The Colonization of Dyfed (Wales)

The most significant Uí Liatháin colony was established in Dyfed (Southwest Wales). Here, the Irish colonists did not just settle; they ruled.

- The Dynasty of Demetia: The ruling dynasty of Dyfed preserved a genealogy that traced back to Irish roots. The Expulsion of the Déisi narrative links this settlement to the expulsion of the Déisi from Tara, but scholarly consensus (supported by Eoin MacNeill) suggests a joint enterprise where the Uí Liatháin were often the dominant partner or operated in tandem with the Déisi.[4]
- Ogham Evidence: The density of Ogham stones in Pembrokeshire, bearing Irish names in a Brythonic context, serves as lithic proof of this Gaelic aristocracy.[5] The Uí Liatháin nobility integrated with the post-Roman Brythonic population, creating a bilingual, bi-cultural ruling class.
- Relevance to the Claim: This historical fact provides the claimant, Cian Mac Liatháin, with an ancestral warrant to the territory of Wales. He is a scion of the original "Gaelic Princes of Wales." This creates a powerful genealogical resonance with the current titleholder, Prince William. The claimant can argue that his lineage represents the indigenous Gaelic stratum of Welsh sovereignty, while Prince William represents the successor English/British legal sovereignty. The "Combined Force" of these two lines covers the totality of Welsh history.[1]

2.3 The Fortress in Cornwall (Dind Map Letan)

The Uí Liatháin expansion extended further south to the Dumnonian peninsula (Cornwall/Devon).

- Dind Map Letan: Cormac's Glossary explicitly refers to a fortress in Cornwall called Dind Map Letan (The Fort of the Sons of Liathán).[4] This confirms that the Uí Liatháin held territory and projected power in the lands of the Cornish Britons.
- Relevance to the Claim: This establishes a direct link between the claimant and the Duchy of Cornwall. Just as the Uí Liatháin were the ancient lords of this maritime promontory, the current Duke of Cornwall (Prince William) is the modern holder of the title. The claim posits a shared "Cornish" heritage, positioning the claimant as a representative of the ancient Irish aristocracy that once held dominion over the Cornish peninsula. This validates the claimant's interest in the preservation of the Cornish language (Kernewek), viewing it as a heritage language of his own dynasty.[1]

2.4 The Matrilineal "Womb of Kings"

Beyond their external conquests, the Uí Liatháin played a pivotal role in the internal dynastic politics of Ireland. They were known as "King-Makers" or, more accurately, the "Womb of Kings" for the Uí Néill dynasty of Tara.

- Angias and the Uí Néill: The genealogy records that Angias, daughter of Ailill Tassach of the Uí Liatháin, married Lóegaire mac Néill, the High King of Ireland who famously confronted Saint Patrick.[6]
- Lugaid mac Lóegairi: The issue of this union was Lugaid mac Lóegairi, who succeeded his father as High King.[6]
- Strategic Implication: This matrilineal link is crucial for the claimant's pretension to the Kingdom of Aileach. Aileach was the seat of the Northern Uí Néill. By descending from the Uí Liatháin—the tribe that provided the mothers of the early Uí Néill High Kings—the claimant asserts a biological affinity with the Uí Néill. He is "of the blood" that produced the High Kings. In Gaelic law, while succession was agnatic (male-line), the status of the mother was vital for the legitimacy and "honor price" of the king. This connection bridges the gap between the claimant's Munster origins and his ambition to rule the Northern seat of Aileach.[1]

3. The Uí Dhéisigh and the Martial Conquest of Connacht

If the Uí Liatháin lineage provides the imperial scope and royal blood, the Uí Dhéisigh (Deacy) lineage provides the martial force (potestas) and the specific territorial claim to Connacht.

3.1 The "Dread Spear" and the Rejection of Tyranny

The foundation myth of the Déisi is the Tairired na nDéssi (The Expulsion of the Déisi). It recounts the violent rupture between the Déisi and the High King Cormac mac Airt at Tara.[4]

- The Blinding of Cormac: The Déisi champion, Óengus Gaíbúaibthech ("Angus of the Dread Spear"), blinded King Cormac in one eye to avenge the dishonor of his niece. Under Brehon Law, a blemished king could not rule, and Cormac was forced to abdicate.[8]
- Symbolism: This act defines the Déisi political theology: Conditional Loyalty. They are the "Vassal Warriors" (Déisi implies vassalage/rent-paying), but they reserve the right to depose unjust authority through force. The claimant interprets the Deacy family motto, Toujours Pret (Always Ready), as a continuation of this doctrine—a permanent readiness to defend the honor of the tribe against central tyranny.[1]

3.2 The Conquest of Thomond and the Dál gCais

Following their expulsion, the Déisi migrated. While one branch settled in Waterford (Déisi Muman), another branch, the Déisi Tuisceart (Northern Déisi), crossed the River Shannon into Connacht.[1]

- Annexation of Clare: This group conquered the territory of Thomond (County Clare), which was then part of the Kingdom of Connacht, annexing it to Munster.[8]
- The Dál gCais Dynasty: From this Northern Déisi stock emerged the Dál gCais, the dynasty that produced Brian Boru, the most famous High King of Ireland.[8]
- Strategic Implication: By claiming the surname Deacy (Uí Dhéisigh), the claimant asserts membership in this conquering super-tribe. He is a kinsman of Brian Boru. This provides the "Warrior Warrant" to the High Kingship. It also legitimizes his claim to Connacht, as his ancestors were the ones who carved out the Kingdom of Thomond from Connacht's southern flank.[1]

3.3 The "Old English" Synthesis: The Dease Connection

The claimant's genealogy also incorporates the "Old English" family of Dease (from Co. Westmeath), descendants of Norman settlers who became "More Irish than the Irish themselves".[1]

- Bishop Thomas Dease: A key archetype is Thomas Dease (1568-1651), Bishop of Meath. He was a Gaelic poet, a Catholic theologian (Rector of the Irish College in Paris), and a political pragmatist who remained loyal to King Charles I while opposing the radicalism of the Confederate Catholics.[1]
- The Model of Dual Allegiance: Bishop Dease serves as the historical precedent for the claimant's "Neo-Jacobite" stance. Just as Bishop Dease balanced loyalty to the Pope (spiritual) and the King (temporal), the claimant balances his role as a Gaelic Cultural King with his allegiance to King Charles III. This synthesis of "Planter and Gael" is essential for a modern all-island monarchy.[1]

4. The British Royal Family: Transitions, Titles, and

Shared Heritage

The claimant's strategy relies on integrating his lineage with the legal sovereignty of the House of Windsor. This requires a detailed analysis of the current Royal Family's relationship with the Celtic nations, particularly the transition from the reign of Charles III to the future reign of William V.

4.1 King Charles III: The Prince who Learned Welsh

King Charles III established a new paradigm for the title Prince of Wales (Tywysog Cymru).

- The 1969 Investiture: Before his investiture at Caernarfon Castle, Charles spent a term at Aberystwyth University learning Welsh under the tutelage of nationalist Dr. Tedi Millward.[10] His investiture speech, delivered in fluent Welsh, marked a departure from centuries of anglicized aloofness.[10]
- Legacy: Charles normalized the idea that the Prince of Wales should engage with the indigenous culture of the Principality. He continues to support Welsh charities and culture as King.
- Engagement with Irish: As King, Charles has extended this linguistic diplomacy to Northern Ireland. During a visit to Belfast in 2024, he notably greeted First Minister Michelle O'Neill in the Irish language ("Tráthnóna maith, a Chéad Aire"), a gesture of profound symbolic weight that legitimized the language within the Unionist state.[12] This directly supports the claimant's argument that the Crown is becoming a vehicle for Pan-Celtic validation.

4.2 Prince William: The "New" Prince of Wales and the Strategy of Immersion

The transition of the title to Prince William in 2022 signaled a deepening of this commitment. Unlike his father, who faced a politically hostile environment in the 60s, William operates in a devolved UK where Welsh culture is institutionally secure.

- Active Learning: Prince William has committed to learning Welsh, reportedly using tools like Duolingo for self-study and practicing phonetically for public engagements.[14] While critics note he is not yet fluent, his St. David's Day messages in Welsh demonstrate a willingness to use the language as a tool of statecraft.[16]
- "Passing the Baton": The late Queen Elizabeth II referred to "passing the baton" of environmental and cultural stewardship to William.[17] For the claimant, this "baton" includes the guardianship of the Brythonic heritage.
- Princess Catherine (The Princess of Wales): The Princess of Wales has integrated Welsh identity into her "Early Years" work. Her Royal Foundation has released resources on childhood development in the Welsh language, reinforcing the status of the language in education and social care.[18] This "soft power" approach aligns with the claimant's educational background and focus on the next generation (Ag Múnlú - To Form/Mould).[1]

4.3 The Duke of Cornwall and the Cornish Language (Kernewek)

Prince William's role as Duke of Cornwall provides a critical lever for the claimant's "Pan-Celtic" strategy.

- Constitutional Status: The Duchy of Cornwall is argued by some constitutionalists to be a distinct entity from the Crown, with the Duke as a de jure head of state for Cornwall.[20] This mirrors the claimant's "Dual Monarchy" theory for Ireland.
- Nansledan and Social Sovereignty: Prince William has launched a major homelessness initiative in Nansledan (Newquay), building high-quality social housing on Duchy land.[21] This project, delivered with Cornish charity St Petrocs, uses the Duchy's wealth to solve local social issues.
- Linguistic Support: The Duchy and the Cornwall Council (under the Devolution Deal) invest in the Cornish language. In 2023, £500,000 was allocated to support Cornish distinctiveness and language.[23] The claimant views this as a model for his own "Kingdom": using the prestige of the title to unlock resources for the Gaeltacht. Just as the Duke builds houses in Nansledan, the Rí would build housing in Connemara and Donegal.

5. The Geopolitical Fulcrum: Claiming the Kingdom of Aileach

The most ambitious component of the claimant's project is the theoretical annexation of the Kingdom of Aileach (North West Ireland). This move is designed to bridge the border between the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland, utilizing the claimant's "Irish Sea Imperium" lineage.

5.1 The Grianan of Aileach: The Stone Temple of the North

The Grianan of Aileach is a massive stone ringfort in County Donegal, sitting on a hilltop that commands views into Counties Derry and Tyrone (Northern Ireland).[24]

- Historical Significance: It was the royal seat of the Northern Uí Néill (Cenél nEógain) from the 5th to the 12th century.[26] It was destroyed by the King of Munster, Muirchertach Ua Briain, in 1101, but restored in the 1870s by Dr. Walter Bernard.[25]
- The Matrilineal Warrant: The claimant asserts a right to Aileach through his Uí Liatháin bloodline. As established, Angias (Uí Liatháin) was the mother of the Uí Néill High King Lugaid.[6] The claimant argues that the Uí Liatháin are the "Maternal Progenitors" of the Aileach kings. Furthermore, the destruction of Aileach by a Munster King (Ua Briain) created a historic rupture; the claimant, a Munster-descended figure (Uí Liatháin/Déisi) who comes in peace to restore rather than destroy, symbolically heals this ancient wound.[1]

5.2 The "Combined Force" Strategy in Northern Ireland

The claimant proposes a "Combined Force" operation to claim Aileach, utilizing the overlapping sovereignties of his lineage and the British Crown.

1. Legal Sovereignty (The Crown): King Charles III is the legal sovereign of Northern Ireland (Derry/Tyrone), which forms the hinterland of Aileach.
2. Ancestral Sovereignty (The Claimant): The claimant holds the "Old Blood" of the Uí Liatháin and Déisi, connecting him to the pre-partition Gaelic order.
3. The Synthesis: By swearing allegiance to King Charles, the claimant unites the "Royal" and the "Gaelic." He proposes that the Grianan of Aileach be recognized as a "Royal Site" of the Dual Monarchy—a place where the British King and the Irish High King can stand together as co-guarantors of the peace.

5.3 Empowering the Pan-Celtic Gaeltacht

The claim to Aileach is not an end in itself but a means to empower the Gaeltacht. The "North West City Region" (Derry-Letterkenny-Strabane) provides the administrative vehicle for this.[27] The claimant proposes using this cross-border structure to channel funding and prestige into Irish language areas.

5.3.1 Specific Empowerment Strategies

The report outlines a strategy for specific Gaeltacht areas:

- Dún na nGall (Gaoth Dobhair): Leverage the "Peace Plus" and "Shared Island" funds to link the Donegal Gaeltacht with the Scottish Gaelic communities (Columba Initiative). The claimant's "Sea Imperium" lineage (connecting Ireland and Scotland) makes him the natural patron of this link.[28]
- Belfast (An Cheathrú Ghaeltachta): Support the Turas project in East Belfast.[30] Turas, led by Linda Ervine, reconnects Protestants with the Irish language. The claimant's "Loyalist High King" stance perfectly aligns with this mission. He can act as a patron for Turas, validating the language for Unionists by showing that one can be both Gaelic and Loyal to the Crown.
- Conamara (Galway): Establish Shantalla ("The Old Ground") and the Claddagh as the "Royal Capital" of the Western Gaeltacht. Use the "Conroy" mercantile connection to revive traditional maritime industries.[1]
- Gaeltacht na nDéise (Waterford): Use the Uí Dhéisigh lineage to claim patronage of the Waterford Gaeltacht (Ring). The Déisi origins in this region provide an unassailable "territorial right" to advocate for its development.[8]

6. Constitutional Frameworks: The Neo-Jacobite Blueprint

To operationalize this claim, the report proposes a constitutional innovation based on historical precedent.

6.1 Surrender and Regrant 2.0

The claimant adopts a modern interpretation of Henry VIII's "Surrender and Regrant".[31]

- The Offer: The claimant "surrenders" any claim to political separatism or republicanism. He accepts the reality of the British Monarch's role in Northern Ireland and the British Isles.
- The Regrant: In return, he seeks the "Regrant" of cultural sovereignty. He asks to be recognized by the Crown and the State not as a political ruler, but as the Custodian of the Gaeltacht, the Ard Rí of Culture. This would give him a semi-official status to consult on language rights, heritage, and cross-border initiatives, similar to the status of traditional chiefs in post-colonial nations like New Zealand (the Māori King Movement).[32]

6.2 The "Dual Monarchy" Model

Drawing on Arthur Griffith's admiration for the Austro-Hungarian model, the claimant proposes a Dual Monarchy of the British Isles.[1]

- Two Crowns, One Head: The "Crown of Ireland" (historically distinct from England) is worn by Charles III. The claimant acts as the High Steward or Tanist of this Crown on Irish soil.
- Benefits: This allows Unionists to remain British subjects and Nationalists to see a Gaelic figurehead at the center of power. It "heals the shield" of Connacht by allowing the Eagle (Britain) and the Arm (Ireland) to coexist.

7. Heraldic and Topographical Validation

The legitimacy of the claim is anchored in the physical and symbolic landscape of Galway and Ireland.

7.1 The Connacht Arms: The Prophetic Map

The Arms of Connacht—Party Per Pale Argent and Azure, in the first an eagle dimidiated and displayed Sable, in the second issuant from the partition an arm embowed and vested, the hand holding a sword erect, all Argent—are interpreted as a prophetic map of the "Dual Blood".[1]

- The Eagle (Uí Liatháin/Lyons): Represents the Imperial, British, and External connection. The Eagle is the bird of Empire (Rome/Germany) and links to the claimant's "cousins," the Windsors (via the shared Lion/Eagle imperial motif).
- The Arm (Uí Dhéisigh/Deacy): Represents the Indigenous, Martial, and Internal power. The Deacy crest (an arm holding a dagger) is a visual rhyme of the Connacht Arm.
- The Synthesis: The claimant is the shield. His existence unites the split halves, symbolizing the end of the partition between "Planter" and "Gael," "King" and "Subject."

7.2 Shantalla and the New Tara

The claimant identifies Shantalla (Sean Talamh) in Galway as his royal seat.[1]

- The Old Ground: Historically the land of the native Irish outside the Anglo-Norman walls, Shantalla represents the "Gaelic hinterland" reclaiming the city.
- The Sliding Rock (Lia Fáil): The "Sliding Rock" in Shantalla, site of Daniel O'Connell's monster meeting in 1843, is identified as the modern Stone of Destiny (Lia Fáil).[1] It is the site where the "Uncrowned King" (O'Connell) asserted the rights of the people. By claiming this rock, the claimant anchors his sovereignty in the tradition of peaceful, democratic agitation.

8. Conclusion

The claim of Cian Mac Liatháin Uí Dhéisigh is a work of high-concept political architecture. It fuses the ancient bloodlines of the Uí Liatháin and Déisi with the modern realities of the British Monarchy to create a "Third Way" for Irish sovereignty.

By leveraging the "Irish Sea Imperium"—the ancient web of connections between Ireland, Wales, and Cornwall—the claimant provides a historical logic for his allegiance to King Charles III and Prince William. He positions himself not as a subject, but as a "cousin" and "partner" in a Pan-Celtic archipelago.

Through the mechanism of "Surrender and Regrant 2.0", the claimant seeks to transform the High Kingship from a defunct medieval title into a vibrant cultural institution. This institution, centered on Aileach and Shantalla, would serve as a powerful engine for the regeneration of the Irish language, utilizing the prestige of the Crown and the funding of the State to ensure that the Teanga (Language) not only survives but thrives in a new, shared future.
