Title: Cross-Jurisdictional Justice: A Strategic Investigation into Ecclesiastical Abuse, State Collusion, and the Leveraged Power of Dual Nationality

Part I: The Geopolitical and Ecclesiastical Landscape of 2026

The year 2026 represents a seminal inflection point in the centuries-old relationship between the British Isles and the Holy See. For a dual Irish-British national, this moment offers an unprecedented convergence of legal, political, and ecclesiastical dynamics that can be leveraged to address the historical open wounds of institutional abuse. The elevation of the Right Reverend Dame Sarah Mullally as the 106th Archbishop of Canterbury in January 2026 [1] has fundamentally altered the optics of religious authority in the United Kingdom, placing a woman at the helm of the Anglican Communion just as the Roman Catholic Church, under the newly elected American Pontiff, Pope Leo XIV, reaffirms its resistance to female ordination.[3] These shifts in high-level leadership are occurring against a backdrop of legislative evolution in Northern Ireland and persistent stagnation in the Republic of Ireland regarding redress for historical abuses. The finalization of the Mother and Baby Institutions, Magdalene Laundries and Workhouses and Redress Scheme Bill in Belfast [5] stands in stark contrast to the continuing fallout of the 2002 Indemnity Agreement in Dublin, a deal that continues to insulate the Catholic Church from the full financial consequences of its actions.

This report conducts an exhaustive investigation into these disparate elements. It examines the systemic corruption within the Irish State—specifically the role of Fianna Fáil administrations in shielding religious orders—and contrasts this with the evolving, though imperfect, safeguarding landscape of the United Kingdom. Furthermore, it analyzes the potential for a dual national to exploit the "jurisdictional arbitrage" available between British and Irish law. By utilizing the superior tort law mechanisms of the UK courts to bypass Irish state immunities, and by leveraging the diplomatic clout of a British passport against a Vatican administration sensitive to its global image, a pathway emerges for forcing the comprehensive investigation and reparations that have been denied for decades.

1.1 The New Papacy: Pope Leo XIV and the American Influence

The election of Cardinal Robert Prevost as Pope Leo XIV in May 2025 marked a historic departure from European dominance of the papacy.[4] As the first American Pope, Leo XIV brings a distinct administrative style shaped by the litigious and media-saturated environment of the United States. However, his tenure has quickly defined itself through a complex mixture of administrative modernization and theological retrenchment. His handling of abuse allegations during his time as Bishop of Chiclayo in Peru and as an Augustinian provincial in Chicago has drawn sharp criticism from survivor networks like SNAP (Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests).[6] These groups accuse him of prioritizing the protection of the institution over the safety of children—a continuity of the very culture of cover-up that his predecessor, Pope Francis, sought to address.

Crucially for this investigation, Pope Leo's papacy has commenced with the issuance of the Apostolic Letter In Unitate Fidei ("In the Unity of Faith") to mark the 1,700th anniversary of the Council of Nicaea.[8] While ostensibly a call for Christian unity and a reaffirmation of the Nicene Creed, the document's emphasis on moving beyond "theological controversies" [9] is widely interpreted by reformers as a strategy to marginalize calls for structural change, such as women's ordination or radical safeguarding reform. This theological positioning creates a specific vulnerability: the Pope's rhetoric of unity can be weaponized by a dual national. By highlighting how the Vatican's refusal to release archives regarding Irish abuses fosters division and distrust, one can argue that the Church is violating its own Pontiff's mandate for "unity through truth."

1.2 The Anglican Counter-Narrative: Archbishop Mullally

In direct contrast to the Vatican's retrenchment, the Church of England's installation of Dame Sarah Mullally represents a radical visual and structural divergence. As the first woman to occupy the Chair of St. Augustine, Archbishop Mullally embodies the possibility of gender parity in ecclesiastical leadership.[1] Her background as the UK's former Chief Nursing Officer brings a professionalized ethos of care to the role. However, her leadership is not uncompromised. The "Survivor N" scandal, involving allegations of mishandled abuse complaints during her tenure as Bishop of London [11], demonstrates that female leadership is not a panacea for institutional self-protection.

Nevertheless, Archbishop Mullally's precarious position creates a diplomatic opportunity. Under pressure to demonstrate her commitment to safeguarding, she may be more susceptible to external pressure to champion the rights of abuse survivors—particularly women survivors of the Magdalene Laundries—than a male leader secure in his traditional authority. A dual national can appeal to her not just as a religious leader, but as a British public official committed to justice, urging her to use her diplomatic channels to press the Vatican on issues that affect British-Irish citizens.

Part II: The Architecture of Impunity – The Magdalene Laundries and State Collusion

The Magdalene Laundries remain the defining symbol of the nexus between Church power, State subservience, and the oppression of women in Ireland. Understanding the depth of this collusion is essential for constructing a legal argument that bypasses the defenses currently relied upon by the religious orders.

2.1 The Myth of the "Private" Institution

For decades, the Irish State maintained the legal fiction that the Magdalene Laundries were private charitable institutions, thereby absolving the government of responsibility for the conditions within them. This narrative was largely deconstructed by the McAleese Report in 2013, which, despite its flaws, confirmed "significant" state involvement.[13] The State did not merely tolerate these institutions; it utilized them as an integral part of the carceral and judicial system.

Women and girls entered the laundries not through spiritual vocation, but often through the coercive machinery of the State. The judicial system remanded women to laundries on probation; the Gardaí returned escapees as if they were prison fugitives; and the Department of Social Protection often withheld benefits, effectively starving women into submission.[15]

Furthermore, the State was a primary commercial client. The laundries held lucrative contracts to wash linen for the army, government departments, and hospitals.[13] This economic relationship transforms the laundries from private charities into state-contracted service providers, a distinction that is vital for modern litigation. If the State was the principal, and the religious orders the agents, then the State shares liability—a fact the Irish government has spent millions to minimize.

2.2 The McAleese Report: A Sanitized Truth

While the McAleese Report was a landmark in admitting state collusion, it is widely regarded by survivors and human rights advocates as a sanitized document. The report controversially claimed that the laundries operated on a "break-even" basis and were not profit-making enterprises.[16] This finding defies economic logic, given the scale of the commercial contracts and the absence of wage bills. Academic analysis by the Clann Project and others suggests that the financial records available to McAleese were incomplete, and the "break-even" conclusion was a political necessity to limit the State's financial exposure to claims of unjust enrichment.[16]

Moreover, the report minimized the prevalence of physical abuse, acknowledging "verbal abuse" but largely dismissing claims of systematic physical violence, despite contradictory testimony from survivors.[15] This minimization served a legal purpose: it framed the harm as "emotional" rather than "tortious" in a way that might trigger massive personal injury payouts. For the dual national, this necessitates looking beyond Irish official reports to international human rights standards and British legal findings to substantiate claims of abuse.

2.3 Fianna Fáil and the Corruption of the Woods Deal

The most formidable obstacle to justice in Ireland is the 2002 Indemnity Agreement, negotiated by the Fianna Fáil government under Taoiseach Bertie Ahern and Minister for Education Michael Woods. This agreement, known as the "Woods Deal," is a case study in political corruption and capitulation to ecclesiastical power.

2.3.1 The Mechanics of the Deal

In the final days of the Fianna Fáil government in 2002, Michael Woods signed a deal with eighteen religious congregations that capped their liability for residential abuse redress at €128 million.[18] In exchange, the State assumed unlimited liability for all future costs. The final bill for redress is estimated to exceed €1.5 billion, meaning the religious orders—whose assets are valued in the billions—contributed less than 10% of the cost of their own crimes.[20]

The negotiation process itself reveals the depth of the corruption:

- Exclusion of Oversight: The Attorney General, the State's chief legal adviser, was deliberately excluded from the final negotiations.
- Financial recklessness: The Department of Finance explicitly advised against the deal, warning that it exposed the taxpayer to an unknown and potentially ruinous liability.[19]
- The "Poverty" Plea: The religious orders, represented by Sr. Elizabeth Maxwell and Sr. Helena O'Donoghue, successfully argued that they could not pay more without selling essential social infrastructure like schools and hospitals.[19] This was a form of moral blackmail: implying that if the State demanded justice for abuse victims, the Church would withdraw its educational and medical services.

2.3.2 The Legacy in 2026

The Woods Deal continues to paralyze Irish government responses. In 2026, Fianna Fáil remains a dominant force in Irish politics, and the party's historical entanglement with the Church continues to influence policy. Recent moves by Minister Norma Foley to pay "reasonable rent" to religious orders for school buildings [21] demonstrate that the transfer of wealth from the State to the Church continues, even as the Church refuses to fully fund reparations. For a dual national, this confirms that the Irish political system is structurally incapable of delivering full justice. The solution must be found elsewhere—specifically, in the United Kingdom.

Part III: Vatican Protectionism – The Canon Law Firewall

The impunity enjoyed by abusive clergy in Ireland was not accidental; it was the result of a deliberate policy enforced by the Vatican, which prioritized the sovereignty of Canon Law over the civil law of the land.

3.1 The 1997 Storero Letter: Undermining Civil Justice

The conflict between Canon and Civil law is best exemplified by the intervention of the Papal Nuncio, Archbishop Luciano Storero, in 1997. When the Irish bishops attempted to introduce a "Framework for a Church Response" to child sexual abuse, which included mandatory reporting to civil authorities, the Vatican intervened. Storero's letter, issued on behalf of the Congregation for the Clergy, dismissed the Framework as merely a "study document" and warned that it must not conflict with Canon Law.[22]

This intervention had a chilling effect. It effectively instructed bishops that they were not bound to report abuse to the Gardaí if doing so violated Canon Law protections for the accused priest or the secrecy of the church governance. The Cloyne Report (2011) later identified this letter as a critical factor in the continuation of abuse cover-ups in the Diocese of Cloyne.[24] It provided a theological and legal shield for bishops who wished to prioritize the reputation of the Church over the safety of children.

3.2 Pontifical Secrecy and Sovereign Immunity

While Pope Francis formally abolished the "Pontifical Secret" for cases of sexual violence in 2019, the culture of secrecy persists. The Vatican continues to assert sovereign immunity in foreign courts, arguing that the Holy See is a sovereign state and therefore cannot be sued for the actions of its "employees" (priests and bishops) worldwide.[26] In 2021, the European Court of Human Rights upheld this immunity in a case involving Belgian survivors, ruling that the Vatican could not be sued in domestic courts.[26]

This legal firewall presents a significant challenge. It means that direct litigation against the Pope or the Holy See is likely to fail. However, the dual national strategy does not rely on suing the Vatican directly; instead, it targets the assets of the religious orders, which do not enjoy sovereign immunity, and uses the Vatican's reputational vulnerability as a pressure point.

Part IV: Comparative Analysis of UK and Irish Responses to Abuse

A dual national is positioned to observe the stark differences in how the UK and Ireland have addressed historical abuse. These differences are not merely academic; they dictate the legal strategy for seeking redress.

4.1 Inquiries: The Ryan Report vs. IICSA

The Irish approach has been characterized by specific, often limited inquiries. The Ryan Report (2009) was extensive but granted anonymity to the abusers, a concession that infuriated survivors. The McAleese Report (2013) was narrowly focused on state involvement in laundries and, as noted, sanitized the findings on physical abuse.

In contrast, the UK's Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse (IICSA), which concluded in 2022, adopted a broader, thematic approach.[27] IICSA examined the Anglican Church, the Catholic Church, and secular institutions side-by-side. Crucially, IICSA did not shy away from linking the culture of clericalism to the failure to protect children. It made statutory recommendations for mandatory reporting and challenged the "seal of the confessional" in a way that Irish inquiries initially hesitated to do. The IICSA reports provide a rich evidentiary basis for establishing "systemic failure" in a legal sense, which is vital for establishing vicarious liability in UK courts.

4.2 Mandatory Reporting: A Divergence in Law

Ireland has, since 2017, implemented strict mandatory reporting laws under the Children First Act 2015.[28] It is a criminal offense for a "mandated person" (including clergy) to fail to report abuse. This was a direct legislative response to the failures identified in the Cloyne Report. The UK, by comparison, has historically relied on statutory guidance rather than a blanket criminal offense for non-reporting, although this has tightened following IICSA.[29] For the dual national, the strict Irish law creates a "liability trap." If a religious order operates cross-border, and a superior in Northern Ireland (UK jurisdiction) becomes aware of abuse in the Republic and fails to report it to the Gardaí, they may be criminally liable in Ireland. This cross-border liability can be used as leverage in settlement negotiations.

4.3 Vicarious Liability: The "Close Connection" Test

The most significant legal divergence lies in the doctrine of vicarious liability—the principle that holds an employer liable for the acts of their employee.

- United Kingdom: The UK Supreme Court ruling in Various Claimants v Catholic Child Welfare Society (2012) (the "Christian Brothers case") revolutionized this area of law.[30] The court established the "Close Connection" test, ruling that religious orders are liable for the abuse committed by their members because the relationship is "akin to employment," even if there is no formal contract. The court recognized that the order creates the risk of abuse by placing the brother in a position of power.
- Ireland: Ireland was slower to adopt this broad view. For years, Irish courts accepted the defense that religious orders were merely unincorporated associations, and thus the "order" could not be sued, only the individual abuser. This changed with the Hickey v McGowan (2017) Supreme Court judgment.[31] The Irish Supreme Court finally aligned with the UK approach, holding the Marist Order vicariously liable.

Strategic Implication: While the laws have converged, the application differs. In Ireland, the Woods Deal indemnity effectively caps the financial exposure of the orders. In the UK, there is no such cap. Therefore, suing a religious order in the UK for abuse committed in Ireland (if jurisdiction can be established) offers a pathway to uncapped damages that is blocked in the Republic.

Part V: Gender, Leadership, and the "Ecclesiastical Cold War" in 2026

The disparity in the role of women across the major denominations in the British Isles has never been wider. This is not just a matter of theology; it is a matter of governance, safeguarding, and power.

5.1 The Church of England: The Paradox of Archbishop Mullally

The appointment of Dame Sarah Mullally as Archbishop of Canterbury is a powerful symbol of progress.[1] It places the Anglican Church in a position of moral superiority regarding gender equality relative to the Catholic Church. However, Archbishop Mullally's leadership is complicated by the "Survivor N" scandal.[12] The accusation that she mishandled a complaint while Bishop of London threatens to undermine her tenure before it fully begins.

For the dual national, this vulnerability is useful. Archbishop Mullally needs to demonstrate that she is a champion of survivors to counteract the negative publicity. Publicly aligning herself with the cause of the Magdalene women—a group of abused women whose suffering was compounded by a patriarchal church—allows her to perform a "penance" that is politically safe (since it criticizes the Catholic Church, not her own).

5.2 The Methodist Church in Ireland: A Model of Egalitarian Mission

The Methodist Church in Ireland (MCI) offers a functional alternative to both the Anglican and Catholic models. The MCI rotates its presidency, and in 2026, the church is led by President Rev. Alan Wardlow and Lay Leader Elaine Barnett.[33] The East Belfast Mission (EBM), a flagship Methodist project, exemplifies this egalitarian ethos.

The EBM is deeply embedded in social justice work, running homelessness services (Hosford) and cross-community initiatives (Turas).[35] Women play central leadership roles in these projects, not as tokens, but as operational directors. This "functional egalitarianism"—where authority is based on competence rather than gender or ordination status—provides a stark contrast to the Catholic model. The dual national can point to the EBM as evidence that religious organizations can be run transparently and inclusively, and that the Vatican's exclusion of women is a choice, not a necessity.

5.3 The Catholic Church: Pope Leo XIV's Retrenchment

Pope Leo XIV's rejection of women deacons in late 2025 [3] and his issuance of In Unitate Fidei signal a retrenchment. The Pope is attempting to "close the ranks" and silence internal dissent. However, this creates a disconnect between the Vatican and the lived reality of Catholics in Ireland and the UK, who are increasingly alienated by the Church's stance on women and LGBTQ+ issues.

By highlighting this disconnect, the dual national can argue that the Vatican is out of step with the values of the citizens it claims to serve. This argument resonates with secular governments in the UK and Ireland, who are increasingly reluctant to grant the Church special privileges or exemptions from equality legislation.

Part VI: Strategic Toolkit for the Dual National

The dual national possesses a "legal passport" that allows them to navigate between these jurisdictions. The following strategy utilizes "Jurisdictional Arbitrage" to bypass Irish state corruption and Vatican immunity.

6.1 Legal Strategy: The "Anchor Defendant" Maneuver

The primary obstacle in Ireland is the Woods Deal. The solution is to sue in the UK. This is achieved through the "Anchor Defendant" strategy.

6.1.1 The Mechanism

Under the legacy of the Brussels I Regulation (Recast) and current English common law, a claimant can sue a foreign defendant (the Irish religious order) in English courts if there is a co-defendant (the "Anchor") domiciled in England.[36]

- The Anchor: The UK branch of the religious order. Most major Irish orders (Sisters of Mercy, Christian Brothers) have UK registered charities with significant assets (e.g., The Union of the Sisters of Mercy of Great Britain, Charity No. 288158 [38]).
- The Nexus: The claimant argues that the UK and Irish branches are part of the same "transnational enterprise" and that the abuse was facilitated by the order's structure.
- Forum Non Conveniens: The defendants will try to move the case back to Ireland, arguing it is the "appropriate forum." The claimant defeats this by arguing that substantial justice cannot be done in Ireland due to the Woods Deal indemnity and the systemic failure of the Irish state to compel discovery.[39]

6.2 Data Strategy: The Clann Project and GDPR

The Clann Project, led by Dr. Maeve O'Rourke, has established a powerful precedent: GDPR applies to the records held by religious orders.[40]

- Action: The dual national should file Subject Access Requests (SARs) for all records held by the orders in both jurisdictions.
- Leverage: If the Irish order refuses (citing Canon Law or privacy), the user can complain to the UK Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) regarding the UK branch's data handling. A cross-border data investigation by the ICO is a significant threat to the orders, as it carries fines of up to 4% of global turnover—a financial hit the orders will be desperate to avoid.

6.3 Diplomatic Strategy: Consular Assistance and the "Shadow Report"

- Consular Assistance: As a British national, the user can request assistance from the FCDO if they are denied justice in Ireland. While the FCDO cannot intervene in court cases, formally raising the issue of the Woods Deal as a barrier to justice creates a diplomatic record that the Irish government finds embarrassing.[42]
- The UN Shadow Report: The Vatican reports periodically to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC).[43] The user should submit a "Shadow Report" to the CRC, detailing the Vatican's refusal to open the Magdalene archives. This report can be drafted with the assistance of groups like the Clann Project and formally submitted by the user as a British-Irish citizen, giving it international standing.

6.4 Utilizing Northern Ireland as a Bridge

The Northern Ireland Assembly's Redress Scheme Bill [5] creates a new mechanism for recognition. Even if the abuse occurred in the Republic, if the user was trafficked or moved across the border (a common occurrence), they may be eligible for the NI scheme. A successful finding of fact by the NI Redress Board can be used as evidence in the "Anchor Defendant" case in England, providing a judicially recognized "fact" of abuse that the English courts will respect.

Table 1: Comparative Jurisdictional Analysis for Strategic Litigation

Feature	Republic of Ireland	United Kingdom (England & Wales)	Northern Ireland
Primary Barrier	Woods Deal (2002): Indemnifies orders; caps liability.	None: No state indemnity for religious orders.	None: HIA Redress Board operates without indemnity constraints.
Vicarious Liability	Evolving: Hickey v McGowan (2017) allows it, but litigation is slow/expensive.	Robust: Christian Brothers case (2012) sets broad "Close Connection" test.	Robust: Aligned with UK Supreme Court precedents.
Limitation Periods	Strict: often used by orders to strike out historic cases.	Discretionary: Courts frequently disapply limitation periods for historic abuse (Sec 33 Limitation Act 1980).	Discretionary: Similar to England/Wales.
Discovery/Disclosure	Difficult: Orders hide behind "private" status and poor record-keeping.	Strong: Pre-action protocols mandate early disclosure; adverse inferences drawn for missing records.	Strong: Redress Board has statutory powers to compel documents.
Strategic Value	Low: High risk of costs; capped recovery.	High: "Anchor Defendant" route allows access to assets; uncapped damages.	Medium: Redress scheme offers guaranteed (but lower) payouts; establishes facts.

Table 2: Key Institutional Actors and Leverage Points (2026)

Actor	Role	Leverage Point
Pope Leo XIV	Pontiff	Hypocrisy: Use his In Unitate Fidei letter to demand "truth for unity." Highlighting his American background to generate US media pressure.

Abp. Sarah Mullally	Archbishop of Canterbury	Redemption: Offer her a "safe" crusade (Magdalene justice) to rebuild her safeguarding reputation after "Survivor N."
Rev. Alan Wardlow	President, Methodist Church Ireland	Ally: Use as a credible, neutral religious voice to amplify calls for justice (East Belfast Mission model).
Fianna Fáil Govt	Irish Government	Shame: expose the ongoing cost of the Woods Deal to the electorate; highlight "renting back" schools from orders.
Sisters of Mercy (UK)	"Anchor Defendant"	Assets: The UK charity (Reg No. 288158) has millions in assets and is vulnerable to UK court judgments.

Conclusion

The pursuit of justice for the Magdalene Laundries and clerical abuse in Ireland has been a decades-long struggle against a state apparatus designed to contain liability and a church structure designed to conceal truth. However, the landscape of 2026 offers a unique configuration of vulnerabilities. The Irish State is trapped by its own corrupt past deals; the Vatican is led by a Pope whose rhetoric of unity contradicts his policy of secrecy; and the Anglican Church is led by a woman seeking to prove her moral authority.
For the dual Irish-British national, these are not abstract political facts; they are the components of a winning strategy. By rejecting the compromised jurisdiction of the Republic of Ireland and pivoting to the courts of the United Kingdom, utilizing the "Anchor Defendant" strategy, the user can bypass the Woods Deal. By leveraging the diplomatic weight of a British passport and the moral contradictions of the new ecclesiastical leadership, they can exert pressure that the Vatican—for all its sovereignty—cannot ignore. The path to reparations lies not in waiting for Dublin or Rome to develop a conscience, but in forcing them to account for their actions in London and Belfast.

Works cited

1. The Rt Revd and Rt Hon Dame Sarah Mullally DBE to become 106th Archbishop of Canterbury | The Church of England, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.churchofengland.org/media/press-releases/rt-revd-and-rt-hon-dam e-sarah-mullally-dbe-become-106th-archbishop-canterbury

2. New Archbishop of Canterbury announced - The Diocese of St Albans, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.stalbansdiocese.org/news/new-archbishop-canterbury-sarah-mullally/
3. Historic Vatican Vote Blocks Women Deacons — Debate Far From Over - YouTube, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=vGFLGKOs5o4
4. What It Means for the First American To Be Chosen as Pope - Georgetown University, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.georgetown.edu/news/what-it-means-for-the-first-american-to-be-chosen-as-pope/
5. Inquiry (Mother and Baby Institutions, Magdalene Laundries and Workhouses) and Redress Scheme Bill – Committee Stage Report - NI Assembly, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.niassembly.gov.uk/assembly-business/committees/2022-2027/executive-office/reports/inquiry-mother-and-baby-institutions-magdalene-laundries-and-workhouses-and-redress-scheme-bill--committee-stage-report/
6. Pope Leo XIV and the abuse crisis: What happens next? | National Catholic Reporter, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.ncronline.org/vatican/vatican-news/pope-leo-xiv-and-abuse-crisis-what-happens-next
7. The Biggest Challenges Pope Leo XIV Faces - Time Magazine, accessed February 6, 2026, https://time.com/7283867/pope-leo-challenges-diversity-globalization/
8. Apostolic Letter In Unitate Fidei on the 1700th Anniversary of the Council of Nicaea (23 November 2025) - The Holy See, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.vatican.va/content/leo-xiv/en/apost_letters/documents/20251123-in-unitate-fidei.html
9. Pope Leo XIV urges Christians to move beyond outdated theological disputes, accessed February 6, 2026, https://ewtnvatican.com/articles/pope-leo-xiv-unity-beyond-theological-disputes
10. Sarah Mullally - Wikipedia, accessed February 6, 2026, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sarah_Mullally
11. Channel 4: Response from the Diocese of London - Anglican.org, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.london.anglican.org/articles/tatement-from-the-bishop-of-london-the-rt-revd-and-rt-hon-dame-sarah-mullally-dbe/
12. Church defends Archbishop of Canterbury's record over abuse scandals, accessed February 6, 2026, https://snapnetwork.org/2026/01/28/church-defends-archbishop-of-canterburys-record-over-abuse-scandals/
13. Magdalene laundries: Ireland accepts state guilt in scandal - The Guardian, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.theguardian.com/world/2013/feb/05/magdalene-laundries-ireland-state-guilt

14. Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee to establish the facts of State involvement with the Magdalen Laundries, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.gov.ie/en/department-of-justice-home-affairs-and-migration/collections/report-of-the-inter-departmental-committee-to-establish-the-facts-of-state-involvement-with-the-magdalen-laundries/
15. Magdalene laundries in Ireland - Wikipedia, accessed February 6, 2026, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Magdalene_laundries_in_Ireland
16. Correcting state narratives on the Magdalene Laundries - UCD Research, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.ucd.ie/research/impact/casestudies/correctingstatenarrativesonthemagdalenelaundries/
17. Publications – Clann: Ireland's Unmarried Mothers and their Children: Gathering the Data, accessed February 6, 2026, https://clannproject.org/publications/
18. Government Responses - Sage Advocacy, accessed February 6, 2026, https://sageadvocacy.ie/services/information-support-and-advocacy-services-for-survivors-of-institutional-abuse/government-responses/
19. State Lost High Stakes Game with Two Nuns, Sam Smyth, Irish Independent, May 22, 2009, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.bishop-accountability.org/news2009/05_06/2009_05_22_Smyth_StateLost.htm
20. Woods Gives Preview of the Conservative Fightback, by Mary Raftery, Irish Times, May 25, 2009 - Bishop Accountability, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.bishop-accountability.org/news2009/05_06/2009_05_25_Raftery_WoodsGives.htm
21. Fianna Fail's Latest Shady Deal With The Bishops - People Before Profit, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.pbp.ie/fianna-fails-latest-shady-deal-with-the-bishops/
22. The Holy See's Response to the Cloyne Report - First Things, accessed February 6, 2026, https://firstthings.com/the-holy-sees-response-to-the-cloyne-report/
23. www.ccrjustice.org - Bishop Accountability, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.bishop-accountability.org/reports/2011_09_13_CCR_Victims_Communication_with_Document_URLs.pdf
24. Canon Law Was Not the Problem - Catholic World Report, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.catholicworldreport.com/2012/07/10/canon-law-was-not-the-problem/
25. Sexual abuse scandal in the Roman Catholic Diocese of Cloyne - Wikipedia, accessed February 6, 2026, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sexual_abuse_scandal_in_the_Roman_Catholic_Diocese_of_Cloyne
26. Rights court: Vatican can't be sued in European courts by sex abuse victims, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.courthousenews.com/rights-court-vatican-cant-be-sued-in-european-courts-by-sex-abuse-victims/
27. Executive Summary | IICSA Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Abuse, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.iicsa.org.uk/reports-recommendations/publications/inquiry/final-report/executive-summary.html

28. Comparing Reports of Child Sexual and Physical Abuse Using Child Welfare Agency Data in Two Jurisdictions with Different Mandatory Reporting Laws - MDPI, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.mdpi.com/2076-0760/9/5/75
29. Mandatory reporting of child sexual abuse in the UK—Are we all talking about the same thing? - Oxford Academic, accessed February 6, 2026, https://academic.oup.com/bjsw/advance-article/doi/10.1093/bjsw/bcaf208/8267930
30. ANALYSING INSTITUTIONAL LIABILITY FOR CHILD SEXUAL ABUSE IN ENGLAND AND WALES AND AUSTRALIA: VICARIOUS LIABILITY, NON-DELEGABLE DUTIES AND STATUTORY INTERVENTION | The Cambridge Law Journal, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.cambridge.org/core/journals/cambridge-law-journal/article/analysing-institutional-liability-for-child-sexual-abuse-in-england-and-wales-and-australia-vicarious-liability-nondelegable-duties-and-statutory-intervention/C728195821EB77EB14F5DD9C6386D47E
31. Vicarious Liability and Historical Abuse: A Critical Analysis of Hickey v McGowan I. Introduction Until 2017, Irish law regardin, accessed February 6, 2026, https://doras.dcu.ie/26741/2/Hickey%20v%20McGowan%20Casenote%20%28Irish%20Jurist%29.ed.pdf
32. Member of religious order vicariously liable for sexual assaults carried out by other member, accessed February 6, 2026, https://decisis.ie/member-of-religious-order-vicariously-liable-for-sexual-assaults-carried-out-by-other-member/
33. accessed February 6, 2026, https://irishmethodist.org/president-lay-leader#:~:text=The%20Rev%20Alan%20Wardlow%20is,the%20Connexional%20year%202025%2D2026.
34. Governance Board - The Methodist Church in Ireland, accessed February 6, 2026, https://irishmethodist.org/governance-board
35. About Us - East Belfast Mission, accessed February 6, 2026, https://ebm.org.uk/about-us/
36. Court of Appeal holds that UK anchor defendants can be sued for the sole purpose of establishing jurisdiction against foreign co-defendants - Herbert Smith Freehills, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.hsfkramer.com/notes/litigation/2019-11/court-of-appeal-holds-that-uk-anchor-defendants-can-be-sued-for-the-sole-purpose-of-establishing-jurisdiction-against-foreign-co-defendants
37. Full article: A return to the doctrine of forum non conveniens after Brexit and the implications for corporate accountability - Taylor & Francis, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/full/10.1080/17441048.2022.2151092
38. THE UNION OF THE SISTERS OF MERCY OF GREAT BRITAIN - Charity Commission, accessed February 6, 2026, https://register-of-charities.charitycommission.gov.uk/charity-details/?regid=2881

58&subid=0
39. Blast from the Past: Forum Non Conveniens Post-Brexit | 10 | 2024 - Debevoise, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.debevoise.com/insights/publications/2024/10/blast-from-the-past-forum-non-conveniens-post
40. How To Access Your Records – Clann: Ireland's Unmarried Mothers and their Children, accessed February 6, 2026, https://clannproject.org/records/
41. SUBMISSION TO UNITED NATIONS SPECIAL PROCEDURES MANDATE-HOLDERS Irish State Responses to Gross and Systematic Forced Family Separation Abuses - Clann Project, accessed February 6, 2026, https://clannproject.org/wp-content/uploads/Clann-Project-Submission-to-UN-Special-Procedures_25-04-25.pdf
42. Consular services for cases involving human rights - House of Commons Library, accessed February 6, 2026, https://commonslibrary.parliament.uk/research-briefings/cdp-2024-0075/
43. Commission Launches Second Annual Report - Tutela Minorum, accessed February 6, 2026, https://www.tutelaminorum.org/commission-launches-second-annual-report/